Tips for Photographing Adoptable Pets

Make your Primary Photo an up-close and clear headshot to draw in potential adopters, preferably with eye-contact. This goes for all animals, including small and large pets.

Create a dedicated picture-taking area and remove all clutter or hide it with a sheet. Neutral or light solid-colored backdrops work best, particularly for dark-furred pets.

Use your camera's zoom feature or a free photo editing program to crop out anything extraneous so the pet is the main focus of the picture.

Take dogs outside and photograph other pets near a window to take advantage of natural light. Avoid a flash if possible as it can frighten animals and add a glare to the eyes.

Get pets to look into the camera with creative use of squeaker toys, funny sounds and dangling feather toys for cats. Eye-contact really connects pets with adopters.

Post multiple pictures, including a headshot looking into the camera, a full body shot and a picture to showcase the pet's personality, like holding a toy or sitting on a lap.

While you have the pet where you want him, take lots of pictures. Several pictures might not be great, but the rest will be fantastic! Thankfully, with digital cameras, this is free.
